

what it meant not to possess liberty. Today, throughout the world we see only too vividly what it means to lose one's liberty. We see it in bleeding France, in ravished Poland, in starving Greece.

It must not happen here in America. It will not happen here as long as the people of America give to their appointed tasks in this war the same devotion and the same determination that, here in Aberdeen, have brought such outstanding results, and that have won for the officials and employees here today the Country-wide recognition that theirs is a job well done, that they are doing their part to save America and all the world from slavery. By such efforts as yours will Victory come to the United Nations, resulting in a durable and honorable peace for humanity.
